CORK - OTHER APPLICATIONS

Cork applications have been growing since the end of the twentieth century, particularly in innovative areas such as Design for Sustainability, Eco-Design and Fashion. New generations of artists are increasingly seeking to create everyday objects - tableware, articles for the kitchen, leisure, furniture - from one hundred percent natural materials that contribute to environmental sustainability. Designers and stylists have also fallen in love with this material which has been used in sports, fashion, architecture and even in art, and are trying to find new ways to apply the cork and make the most of its advantages. Cork has also emerged as a differentiating factor in areas such as transport, where the replacement of existing materials for cork allows efficiency gains at the technical level.

CORK – ONE THOUSAND AND ONE APPLICATIONS

Cork fabric and paper

Very thin sheets of natural or agglomerated cork (usually with a thickness of 50-500mm) glued to fabric, textiles or paper. This application highlights the texture and veins of cork which can be detected by touch. They are produced in various patterns and used in accessories, namely leather goods, fashion and clothing.

Cork wool

Cork wool can be used in certain types of packaging, but also as a filler for mattresses, pillows or divans. Its properties are remarkable: non-toxic, capacity for compression and recovery, durability, lightness, impermeability and insulation. It is noted for its ability to cure certain sleep disorders, and can be combined with a range of aromas for medicinal purposes.

Cork dust

A by-product of cork processing, it can be used to produce a range of chemical compounds for various purposes and applications, specifically for medical purposes or energy-saving measures.

Cork yarn

Cork yarn is available in several colors for use in knitting.

Corksorb

Corksorb products are able to absorb oils and organic solvents without absorbing water. They float even when saturated and can be used to deal with all kinds of spills and leaks. The products are suitable for absorption of flammable materials. They are available in the following forms: cork granules, tube-shaped barriers, cushions and cleaning buoys.

Motor Vehicle and Aeronautical Industry

Although cork is already used in the motor vehicle industry in gaskets (cylinder head, gear box, etc.) and on the floors of public transport vehicles, other applications of cork products in the passenger compartment have been under study. These studies include appliqués, handbrake and gear lever grips, the covering of the steering wheel and dashboard, etc. Two examples of this use are the prototype model F700 of Mercedes Benz and the interior of the aircraft developed by Embraer in the LIFE project - Lighter, Integrated, Friendly and Eco-efficient.
